This slide shows four kinds of legal systems common in almost any nation: International, Civil, Administrative, and Public Justice (Criminal). The Administrative Legal System (ALS), and Public Justice System (PJS) are singled out here for their high and very harmful systemic opportunities for corruption. The blanks to fill in on the ALS side could be, when things are done as they should be "smoothness, stability, and economic and social growth;" when not done with integrity, "frustration, impediments to growth."

Blanks to fill in on the PJS side could be, when things are done as they should be, "reduced social ills and crimes, greater growth;" when not done as they should be, "increased crime and social ills, inhibiting growth."

If infractions of good laws are seriously enforced and strong consequences imposed, corruption will decrease and economic and social growth will increase. It will cost too much for corruptors to abuse the system, so they will alter their behavior.
